INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL ORDER

This Court by separate order has found that the Plaintiff States have shown a likelihood of success on the merits of their claim that the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (“DACA”) program is contrary to the Administrative Procedure Act (“APA”). The Court also found that the Plaintiff States had made a clear showing of irreparable injury. The Court did not grant the requested preliminary injunction as it found that the States had delayed seeking this relief for years, that the balance of private interests fell in favor of the denial of the requested relief, and that implementing that relief at this point in time was contrary to the best interests of the public. The Court addressed almost all of the issues in contention and went into more detail than was required to reach its conclusion due to the critical nature of the subject matter in dispute. The denial of interlocutory relief is not usually appealable, and in the few circumstances where it is appealable, courts tend to postpone deciding significant issues on an interlocutory basis. Nevertheless, this Court is entering this order certifying this matter for interlocutory appeal as the issues covered herein are of major import to a large segment of this country, and all parties anxiety that will necessarily result from a protracted delay.

VII

The Court has considered various rulings from district courts in three different circuits that block the rescission of the DACA program and one, from a fourth circuit, that refused to block it. While this case concerns DACA's creation and implementation, there are many overlapping issues. Recently, both judges and commentators have opined that circuit splits are actually healthy for the development of this country's jurisprudence. If that premise is actually accurate and if the appellate courts in those circuits affirm the judgments from the other district courts, and if this Court is affirmed on appeal, the primary issues in question would be poised for resolution by the Supreme Court.

VIII

Having so ruled, this Court hereby stays this case for 21 days. If any party elects to pursue an interlocutory appeal of the Court's order on the request for a preliminary injunction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), in addition to any other requirements by rule or statute, the appealing party shall provide notice to this Court and the Court will subsequently entertain a request to extend the stay. If no party elects to appeal, the Court will schedule a hearing to implement a new scheduling order that will control the resolution of the remaining issues in this case.

Signed this 31st day of August, 2018.

Andrew S. Hanen
United States District Judge
